

V&A reveals further details on first major exhibition celebrating the ‘Golden Age’ of the Mughal Court

The Great Mughals: Art, Architecture and Opulence

9 November 2024 – 5 May 2025

Galleries 38 & 39, V&A South Kensington

Today the V&A announces further details of the major new exhibition The Great Mughals: Art, Architecture and Opulence, which will be the first to present the monumental artistic achievements of the ‘Golden Age’ of the Mughal court (c. 1560-1660). Opening November 2024, this landmark exhibition will celebrate the extraordinary creative output and internationalist culture of Mughal Hindustan during the age of its greatest emperors. It will shine a light on one of the wealthiest courts in the world and tell the story of an immense early modern empire, largely untold within the U.K.

Susan Stronge, Curator of The Great Mughals: Art, Architecture and Opulence said: “This is the first exhibition to reveal the internationalist art and culture of the Mughal court. Hindustani artists, Iranian masters and even a few Europeans came together in the imperial workshops to create a new, hybrid art. We are pleased to display some of their greatest creations, many of which have never been exhibited before.”

The Mughal dynasty was founded in 1526 by Babur, a Timurid prince and ruler from Central Asia. At its peak it was one of the wealthiest and most progressive empires in the world, and extended from Kabul in present-day Afghanistan, to the borders of the Deccan sultanates in the south of the subcontinent, and from Gujarat in the west to present-day Bangladesh in the east.

The exhibition will showcase over 200 objects across three sections spanning the reigns of Emperors Akbar (r.1556-1605) Jahangir (r.1605-1627) and Shah Jahan (r.1628-1658) and will celebrate the craftsmanship and creativity of their court workshops. Rarely shown paintings and illustrated manuscripts not seen for a generation will be on display alongside delicate textiles, brilliantly coloured carpets and fine objects made of mother of pearl, rock crystal, jade and precious metals.

A particular focus of the exhibition will be to examine the extraordinary hybrid art created in the imperial workshops by Iranian and Hindustani artists and craftsmen working in the Persian-speaking court and producing work of exceptional quality. It will explore the influence of European art brought to the court by Christian missionaries, foreign ambassadors, and merchants.

Famous and rarely seen objects drawn from the V&A collections will be displayed with significant national and international loans, this exhibition will bring to life the unparalleled opulence and mastery of Mughal art. Highlight loans include bejewelled objects and precious stones, on loan from the al-Sabah Collection in Kuwait, including a precious deep red engraved spinel owned by Timur's grandson Ulugh Beg, and later by Jahangir and Shah Jahan and an exceptionally fine Mother of Pearl shield (c. 1580), made in Gujarat, that was in the Medici collections by 1599 and is on loan from the Museo Nazionale del Bargello in Florence.

About the exhibition:

The first section will introduce the reign of Akbar, generally considered one of the greatest emperors in Indian history. Catapulted into power at thirteen in 1556, Akbar embarked on a successful campaign of military expansion and whilst his reign was tumultuous, with rebellions across their territories, it was also an inventive and innovative time creatively. Akbar established court workshops including the Goldsmiths workshop and the House of Books and championed new crafts.

Precious objects made in these workshops will be on display in this section, including two rarely seen folios from the colourfully illustrated volumes of the Hamza-Nama, or 'Book of Hamza', commissioned by Akbar in the 1570s, on loan from the Museum of Applied Arts, Vienna, which will be reunited with a folio from the Fitzwilliam Museum. The Hamza-Nama assembles folk tales often told orally across the Islamic world of the Muslim hero Hamza and his followers as they battle against demons, witches and supernatural forces. These remarkable paintings demonstrate the new and distinctively Mughal style of painting that combined Safavid Iranian conventions with the very different pictorial traditions of the Hindu and Muslim artists of Hindustan. Another highlight of this section which demonstrates this Mughal style will be a pictorial carpet (c. 1590–1600), on loan from the Museum of Fine Arts, Boston. On display in the U.K for the first time, this two-meter-long carpet combines Iranian conventions with pictorial scenes inspired by Mughal manuscript painting. The designs compare closely with details in paintings of the period, including the mythical hybrid gajasinha, a winged, lion-bodied, elephant-headed beast under attack by a fantastic flying bird, the simurgh.

Also on display will be paintings and engravings by Mughal Court artists inspired by European art brought to the court by Jesuit missionaries from Portuguese Goa. Decorative arts and metalwork of unparalleled quality will also feature in this section, including a Ceremonial Spoon of chased gold and set with rubies, emeralds and diamonds. The spoon combines uniquely Indian goldsmithing techniques with Iranian designs and a European form.

The second section will explore the arts of the reign of Akbar's son, Jahangir. Jahangir inherited this well-run and wealthy empire in 1605, which was described by the English ambassador to King Charles 1 as 'the treasury of the world'. The splendour of Court and palace ritual will be explored in this section through the display of paintings and precious objects of great opulence and rarity. A gold dagger and scabbard set with over two thousand rubies, emeralds and diamonds, on loan from the al-Sabah collection will be shown next to a finely crafted jewelled jade pendant and number of imperial wine cups made of imported Chinese jade, including a wine cup on loan from The Al Thani Collection, which is the earliest known dated Mughal jade. The wine cup is inscribed with Jahangir's titles and Persian verses in praise of wine, and was created by Iranian Master Sa'ida Gilani, the Iranian supervisor of the imperial goldsmiths' department. These precious objects were often revealed to the court during the opulent celebrations that took place at Nowruz, or New Year, or were exchanged between members of the court at the Birthday Weighing of the Emperor.

A unique Mughal Hunting coat, made in the 1610s will feature in this section. This vibrant coat - a highlight from the V&A collection - is embroidered with animals and plants using sixteen different colours of dyed silk across thirteen panels of fine white satin. With a composition designed by manuscript painters, the coat depicts a variety of birds, hares, spotted leopards and striped tigers ready to pounce, cranes in mid-flight, and naturalistic flowers.

Finally, this section will explore Jahangir's travels across the empire accompanied by court arts and craftsmen in the vast tented encampment. His leading artists painted the animals they saw on their travels or that had been given to the emperor by ambassadors from across the globe. On display from the V&A archive will be two vividly naturalistic paintings - very rarely seen - by Jahangir's famous artists, depicting exotic animals including a North American Turkey Cock, and an African zebra.

The third and final section will explore the reign of Shah Jahan who is perhaps most famous internationally for commissioning the Taj Mahal. Shah Jahan presented a strong and unified imperial image - his name means 'king of the world' - which was projected across all the arts of the court. Floral imagery reinforced the notion that the empire was a garden of paradise under Shah Jahan's just rule, ornamenting architecture, jewellery and the art of the book. On display will be tiles and embroidered textiles featuring blossoming plants and flowers, as well as albums decorated in gold, with flowers painted in the borders. A key feature of this section will focus on the Taj Mahal, the tomb built by the emperor for his beloved wife Mumtaz Mahal. 19th century architectural drawings depicting the details of the marble inlaid with semi-precious will be on display, as well as a model reproduces in miniature the cenotaph of the Queen.

The internationalism and wealth of life at court will come into focus in the section, with vibrant paintings depicting formal court assemblies and celebrations as well as members of the court and the imperial family. Another key object will be the V&A's famous wine cup crafted from white nephrite jade, made for Shah Jahan in 1657. The extremely fine cup is shaped with the head of a ram and inscribed with his title and is one of the most exquisite surviving objects from his reign.

The finale showcases precious stones from the Imperial Workshops, and the uniquely Mughal cuts of diamonds from Golconda. Eight rare treasures from the al-Sabah Collection will be presented here, including the exceptional red royal spinel inscribed with the names of six rulers, engraved by imperial court master Sa'ida, and a 110 carat Colombian emerald pendant bead, carved with a delicate flower motif.
