- The UK's first child-centered museum exhibition around creativity in ancient Egypt, showcasing Egypt's potential for inspiring design creativity through ancient artefacts, contemporary art and design, and captivating scenography
- Over 200 creative works spanning over 5,500 years from the V&A's expansive collection and national loans to be displayed, from the extraordinary fully painted inner sarcophagus of Princess Sopdet-em-haawt and ancient inscribed stelae to contemporary comics, games and film, including El3osba (The League) and Moon Knight, Minecraft, Lego and The Mummy* (1999)
- Hands-on activities including drawing with scale, deciphering hieroglyphics and designing your own amulet, plus 'touch' objects bring young visitors closer to the tools, materials and skills used by ancient Egypt's makers
- Contemporary craft and design responses to ancient Egyptian creativity including work by solar designer Marjan van Aubel Studio and jewellery designer Azza Fahmy
- New film commissions with artists Zahed Tajeddin and Miriam Johnson explore the process of ancient Egyptian art techniques of stone carving and faience amulet making

Today, Young V&A reveals a first look inside its second exhibition Making Egypt, created for children and families, which takes visitors on a fascinating journey through the ancient past to modern day, exploring ancient Egypt's creativity and how it continues to influence art, design and popular culture.

Told across three sections exploring themes of Storytelling, Communicating and Making, with gods guiding each step of the way, Making Egypt journeys through the Nile, inviting young visitors to uncover ancient Egypt’s myths and gods and the landscape and culture that inspired them.

Making Egypt features ancient artefacts – many on display for the first time including decorative funerary masks and linen shrouds dating back over 2,000 years - contemporary fashion, jewellery, comics, film, games, sculpture, ceramics and more from across V&A’s collection, as well as national loans. Young visitors can try their hand at deciphering the mysteries of hieroglyphs, discover meaning and messages communicated through colour, as well as explore hands-on the making of objects that populated ancient Egypt.

Benjamin Hinson, Curator of Making Egypt, says: “Ancient Egypt fascinates us like no other society. As a fundamentally visual culture, Egypt has influenced art, design and performance for centuries and remains just as compelling today. From exploring Egypt’s stories, making processes and techniques to thinking about the heritage and cultural presentation of objects from an ancient society, Making Egypt offers our young visitors fresh insights into the creative practices of one of the longest-lasting civilizations in the world, showcasing how an ancient culture can inspire the future makers of today.”

Dr Helen Charman, Director of Learning, National Programmes and Young V&A, says: “We are delighted to be opening Making Egypt, our second exhibition at Young V&A, designed and curated specifically for children and young people. Through its exploration into the lasting impact of creativity from an ancient culture, we hope to continue Young V&A’s commitment to excite, provoke curiosity and fire the imagination of our young visitors.”

The exhibition is divided into three sections – Storytelling, Communicating and Making – each exploring Egyptian creativity through a different lens. Journeying from sunrise to sunset along the Nile, Making Egypt invites visitors to encounter the landscapes, stories and people that inspired ancient Egypt’s creative language, with playful illustrations of gods Amun, Thoth and Ptah by artist Jean Wei guiding the way.

Throughout, contemporary responses from jewellery and fashion designers, graphic novelists, ceramic artists and beyond will spotlight ways in which ancient Egypt’s beliefs, stories and characters continue to inspire makers today. Their works will be shown alongside sketches and design images, photos of workshops, tools and quotes from the artists themselves, unpacking their creative processes.

Free educational tickets for schools will be available for Monday-Thursday mornings during term time, from 3 March – 18 July 2025 and 8 September – 17 October 2025.
